When it comes to technology, we're pretty much in it for the long haul. For example, our PC desktop could be 50 or 60 years old, if not older, but that just means we use the same technology we did (hence the term digital -- as in older technology). The leading technology used today, however, in a lot of printers and other devices, is a combination of digital imaging and laser technology (2D) and fiber optic cables, or in some cases, the term 'digital printing' is used. In my mind, what is called digital printing is really more like digital imaging, as all materials are being digitally imaged or imprinted, including the toner or ink bottle. I used to joke that I'd love to get something that would print out a copy of pages from the 1939 Cisco Kid. Then I read an article about an inexpensive device that brings out the digital image on a piece of paper that you can read - and it is terribly similar to 1939! I bought one of these devices, named the JDS Uniphase 2001 and was very excited to see that it works and is very similar to a 1939 Cisco Kid device. I was also happy to see that the price of this device was very low, in fact, it costs much less than the cost of a 1939 Cisco Kid.
