Postoperative wound pain, a frequent complication of surgery, can be relieved by epidural morphine. The aim of the present study was to compare epidural morphine and fentanyl in a prospective, randomized, double-blind study. Sixty patients undergoing elective lower limb surgery were randomized to receive epidural morphine (0.05 mg/kg) or fentanyl (0.1 microgram/kg) in the recovery room. The two groups were comparable with regard to age, weight, duration of surgery and requirement of parenteral morphine in the first 24 h. Patients receiving epidural morphine had a lower degree of pain, lower consumption of morphine, and greater satisfaction with analgesia. A single epidural injection of fentanyl is therefore a more effective analgesic than epidural morphine for postoperative wound pain.You know what I've always wanted to do as a hostess for my girls and their friends?
