Prevalence and predictors of postoperative continence and resumption of micturition after sphincter-preserving anterior resection for low rectal cancer. Preoperative assessment of anal sphincter function in patients undergoing sphincter-preserving resection for low rectal cancer is essential but not universally performed. The aim of this study was to assess postoperative continence and micturition after sphincter-preserving anterior resection for low rectal cancer. The study included patients who underwent sphincter-preserving anterior resection for low rectal cancer between August 2012 and May 2014 in the medical oncology department of the department of oncology in the University of the West Indies. Pre- and postoperative details including age, gender, tumour, and node status, preoperative and postoperative urinary and faecal incontinence, and postoperative bladder neck contractility were recorded. The main outcome measures were continence and resumption of micturition. Forty-two patients were studied. The mean age was  $59.8 \pm 6.8$  years, and 31 (73.8%) were male. The majority of patients had histopathologically positive nodes. Of the patients, 58.3% were continent preoperatively, 20.5% were continent postoperatively, and 13.8% were incontinent before discharge from the hospital. Postoperatively, 24.0% of patients resumed micturition. No patient had incontinence following discharge from the hospital. Overall, 81.0% of patients resumed micturition. There was no statistically significant association of age, gender, tumour, and node status, preoperative and postoperative urinary and faecal incontinence, and postoperative bladder neck contractility with postoperative micturition. There was a statistically significant association of preoperative urinary and faecal incontinence with postoperative continence ( $P = 0.03$  and  $P = 0.01$ , respectively) and the ability to resume micturition ( $P = 0.002$  and  $P = 0.01$ , respectively). Preoperative assessment of anal sphincter function is essential in patients undergoing sphincter-preserving anterior
