Time is of the essence in product development, and nothing epitomizes that more than user interface. Licensing is one way of keeping your customization to a minimum and ensuring long-term accessibility. Regardless of the amount of work you put into your final product, you may still find yourself tempted to make changes to it that might be incompatible with other products within the Creative Suite. Making changes to the software requires that you upgrade, and that can be a hassle. Using the Creative Cloud platform, you license to use only the relevant versions of the product and create custom sets of product templates for your business needs. For example, you can create a Company A version of the Pro Contax, Pro Sidewinder, or any other product you own. This is a convenient way of selling Photography Solutions, rather than ending up with a sticky mess of partially updated files in your own library. It takes away the need for updates and customers can avoid having to load a different program or install additional plugins to use it. Yes, Lightroom itself can import over 70 RAW formats, and that is awesome. But this still adds a good bit of complexity to the equation. For example, you may not import RAW files from all your cameras if they are not supported yet. As features progress, they do get added simply because they are useful. Perhaps in the future we will not even have to import raw files, but allow Lightroom to work directly with a camera. Even so, I am reminded of the power of Agfa's Capture One software, which allows you to upload some RAW files directly from your camera. Lightroom can't do that, but it can still let you import the camera's metadata which of course means that you don't have to wait for Lightroom to load the raw files.
